This project is the product of several fragmented walks I took during the summer of 2024. When stitched together, these walks construct the entire length of Edgware Road – the stretch of the A5 from Marble Arch station until it crosses the M1 where it exits the territory of Greater London. Edgware Road is ancient, dating back to the Romans, and it remains uncannily straight for almost ten miles. An endless corridor cutting through North-west London. My walks did not abide by any chronology or order – neither the end nor beginning were walked first or last. This disorganised approach was dictated by the city itself: bus routes, the unreliable Jubilee line, and a dead-end job in retail.

My main tool was a temperamental handheld scanner imported from China. Its narrow width produces fragments: a corner, edge, or mid-section. The ‘whole’ of an inscription on a surface is left for speculation – fragments are clues, they’re obscured from their whole. The surface’s smoothness (or lack of it) determines the scan’s legibility or clarity, the textuality is then indexed in the scan. The inflections and inscriptions (intentional or unintentional) upon these surfaces along Edgware Road are the focal point of this project. I set out to document surfaces as textures but instead found myself repeatedly drawn to text in all its forms. Language is echoed up and down the road: especially warnings, threats, and declarations of authority or territory.

During the process, I began to feel displeased with how my fragments of surfaces failed to significantly reflect the social space of the road that I witnessed on my walks. My scans reflected a one-dimensional landscape of brands and corporations – no less real and present than the social space, but only one side of a many-sided prism. In response, I decided to include observational texts developed from brief notes I typed on my phone as I took breaks along my routes. Text appears again as a shopping list index, locating each scan in a precise time and space. This act refers to a potential mapping – a topological approach to a constantly fluctuating and changing space. Every day a new layer of paint goes up.

Across from the Noor Supermarket, a man stands inside a telephone box. He has the plastic phone pressed to his ear as crowds pass by. No one appears to notice him. I'm unsure whether these phones are still in operation - the wires are likely cut. Is there a voice on the other end or just silence? Next to the supermarket is a store that out front has one of those LED signs with green rolling letters, commonly seen outside pharmacies. The text animates and declares in all-caps: "ISLAMIC MARRIAGES". I look back across the road to the phone box and the man is no longer there.

The ruins of Paddington Green Police Station sit starkly behind dark green construction fencing. In the process of demolition and partly shrouded in white tarpaulin, the building exists in frozen time. Its interiors become exposed to the exterior, and its rebar and foundations are once again visible. Wikipedia states that the station held subterranean cells as part of an interrogation centre for prisoners suspected of terrorism. Locked below the road were once suspected IRA members and then later British nationals transported from Guantanamo. In 2020, the building was briefly squatted and occupied by the Green Anti-Capitalist Front. Happy to oblige in the erasure of this 'difficult' history, the fencing is stamped with the proud emblem of Berkeley Group – one of the various property developers who are perfecting the profession of social cleansing. The site will feature luxury flats where the cheapest option will be a studio flat for £730k. I feel bitter and spiteful. I think of my own cramped studio, further north on this very road, awaiting my return – a night filled with the sound of blarring traffic. Or of my co-workers whose 'London living wage' paycheck is swallowed whole by the price of having children. Behind me, under the Marylebone flyover, is a camping tent with an occupant asleep inside. Next to the tent is a man asleep atop a thin stack of cardboard.

Across the road is a cul-de-sac of Mock Tudor houses guarded behind a seven-foot electronic gate. An enclave of privacy lined with trees. I struggle not to speculate about the inhabitants. The material assets and spaces of London's wealthy can be spotted everywhere – expensive cars, luxury houses, exclusive workplaces, fancy restaurants and retail outlets are dotted across the city. Yet the owners are always elsewhere – possibly behind the tinted windscreen of a car or huge panes of glass in a skyscraper, or even acting through the wage labour of a personal shopper.

whilst flipping between apps on my phone I notice:

Another furnace is produced by penny-pinchers. The poor sacrificed for maximum profit. The building management - Block Management UK - is nowhere to be found.

Bulging suitcases are dumped next to overflowing waste bins. The contents - children's clothes and shoes - form a small pile on the grass. Likely theft from unsuspecting tourists, the worthless junk dumped by thieves. That or the lost belongings of fugitive immigrants who have disappeared into the dense and knotty world of criminalised existence.

I pass the veranda of a derelict shisha bar which is littered with black bin liners, mismatched clothes, and an assortment of blankets and empty plastic bottles. Amongst this, the shape of a human body lies under a bare, clean white duvet. Black feet stick out the end. I often walk this stretch of the road on my way to work. He's been sleeping there for what must be around six months, though I've never glimpsed his face.

In recent weeks race riots have sprung up across England.

Near Rotherham, Fascist thugs attack and attempt to start a fire on the ground floor of a Holiday Inn sheltering asylum seekers. Online the phrase “import the third world, become the third world” spreads like a plague. These are the fabricated, warped nightmares of (so-called) Londonistan.

Once in Stanmore, I find myself increasingly walled in by tall conifers and hedges, obscuring large houses with sweeping driveways, high-pitched roofs and tall chimneys. Almost all these houses have small signs by the roadside announcing something along the lines of CCTV, alarm systems and various private security companies. Neighbourhood watch isn't sufficient around here. My suspicious photographing and scanning likely has me tagged as a burglar researching possible hits.

walking north up the final stretch of the A5 feels like leaving London: the pavement gives way to the road, green fields begin to open up, the sky feels wider, and the air less pungent.

I cross the M1 to be sure I've completed the A5 within the borders of Greater London. Passing a sign that declares the territory of Hertfordshire, it reads: "The county of opportunity." There's no sign welcoming drivers into London, no sign to designate its defining characteristic - opportunity appears to have already been taken. I then walk partly around the A41 roundabout. There's nothing of interest here, nothing of significance, just an Esso garage and a Greggs. The same black and white advert for fireworks is tied to every lamppost. There's no grand ending, no moment of profound reflection or recognition. I notice a disused road sign which has fallen over in the long grass, it declares: "Zone ends." I turn and begin my journey home.
